READING

In recent years, working from home has become common at many companies. However, some businesses are changing this policy. They are asking more employees to return to the office.

Why are companies making this change? At the office, workers can speak with each other directly, so communication may be smoother. They can quickly ask questions or discuss problems with their coworkers. Moreover, offices usually provide equipment and spaces that are suitable for work. Employees can use stable Internet connections, meeting rooms, and other useful tools.

However, returning to the office also has drawbacks. For example, traveling to work every day can be tiring. This is especially difficult for people who live far from their workplace. Another problem is that offices may contain many things that make it hard to concentrate. For example, conversations, phone calls, or people moving around can interrupt employees while they are working.
