READING

Schools use many activities to develop students' communication skills. Written assignments are common, but speaking tasks are also important. Some schools are increasing the number of presentations students give in class.

What are some benefits of more presentations? Preparing a clear explanation can improve logical thinking. Students must organize ideas, choose useful evidence, and present information in a reasonable order. In addition, regular practice can build public speaking skills. Students may learn to control their voices, make eye contact, and answer questions.

However, increasing presentations also has some disadvantages. Speaking in front of others can create serious mental pressure for some students. They may feel strong anxiety before or during the activity. Another drawback is that preparing a presentation requires a great deal of time. Students may need to research information, create slides, practice repeatedly, and revise their work, leaving less time for other important subjects or regular school activities.
