Courts usually require judges, lawyers, parties, witnesses, and other participants to attend hearings in a courtroom. Online hearings use secure video systems so that some participants can join from another location. Documents may also be shared electronically during the session. Courts may use this approach for certain procedural matters, short hearings, or cases in which traveling to the courthouse would be especially difficult.

Supporters believe online hearings have several advantages. Participants who live far from a courthouse can avoid long journeys and may need less time away from work or family responsibilities. This can make attendance easier. Furthermore, lawyers, experts, or interpreters in different locations can join the same hearing without all traveling to one building, which can make scheduling some cases more flexible.

However, critics have concerns. Weak internet connections, poor sound, or software problems can interrupt testimony. This makes it difficult for participants to hear or respond at the right time. There is another problem. Video can make body language, eye contact, and reactions harder to observe than in a courtroom. Judges and lawyers may have less information when assessing how a witness or participant is communicating, especially during complex or sensitive exchanges.
